passed through an era of paper currency under the old state bank system which had inured us to the idea, but given us a great deal of worry when the times grew hard and the banks began to break. The relief experience at the thought of having a currency which every citizen would have to take in discharge of a debt and which was presumably as strong as the government, was so great that only habitual or professional students of finance paused at that point to give the matter very serious thought. Those who did prophesied, with what now seems mi velous foresight, the results which would flow from this riot in irredeemable paper, no matter how well backed.

Sure enough, when they had acquired a taste for that kind of financiering in which the printing press is the most active agent, the people began to encern themselves less with the question of how to raise funds for the replenishing of the treasury than how to spend the money which could be made by simply pulling a lever and setting a machine in motion. For several years scarcely any form of extravagance which promised a temporary gratification was to absurd in principle to find support from some party or faction of a party among the so-called "plain people." It was the same plain people under whose encouragement congress plunged the country into the present war. The trouble with the plats ple is usualy that, however excellent their purposes and however patriotic their impulses, they are not accustomed to look ahead and see where a certain course is bringing them out. In the matter of pen-sions fr instance, while they pride themselves on the generosity which prompts them to relieve the necessities of the soldier's widow, they do not keep in mind the fact that the government has no fixed come, and that every dollar given to the soldier's widow has to be taken out of the pocket of some mechanic's widow among the rest. As in the greenback era it took several hard-fought political cam-paigns and a long period of trade depression to teach these sanguine souls that for every debt there must be a day of liquidation, and that when a borrowed dollar burns a hole in one's pocket today. rations or supplies are furnished to the it means that tomorrow that dollar or its

The argument which we shall hear freely advanced at the close of the present war, if it comes ut happily for us as it now seems probable, is that we need stop at nothing we wish to do on the grounds of expense, because we "have only to issue bonds" and go aheod; and the American who ventures to question the wisdom of increasing the national debt for any purpose which has tempornight at the Gilsey House and a part of nearly always won. MANUAL FOR TROOPS

Washington, June 31.-Brigadier General Stone, now on the staff of Major General Miles, has prepared a manual for the use of troops operating in Cuba, covering the most expeditions means of cutting military roads through the tangled tropical vegetation, swamps and underbrush through which the American army must push its way in Cuba. General Stone was the road expert of the agricultural department, but on the breaking out of the war Secretary Alger asked that he be assigned to the military service with view to making his expert knowledge available in road building through Cuba. He has made a study of Cuban soil, vegetation and timber growth and besides a personal acquaintance with the country. he has collected a large number of photographs, maps, etc., which show it all the topography and vegetation of the island. With this material in hand, General Stone has framed his manual for 5th, 1898. military roads in Cuba, which has within the last few days been distributed to commanding officers for their guidance

In opening roads through Cuba, General Stone makes good use of the guava tree or bush, which grows in luxurious abun dance throughout the Island. He gives diagrams by which this is to be cut, and he boughs bound upward, making a comoact roll, about the size of a small log. These guava bundles, known as fascines, are laid lengthwise, one row of bundles lapping over another like shingles. There are successive layers of this, bound together, making a serviceable roadway, strong enough for troops and even for neld ordnance.

The manual lays down the following general plan for Cuban road making; extension to September lat. "If the road is an important one chould have about sixteen feet of travelway and, to allow for ditches on either the ground should be cleared at east thirty feet wide.
